A PDF file includes a dictionary of the document's character set (e.g., if you're printing it from a word processor, that document's character set). This is easily set by an HTML program; when I use, say, AppleWorks, I can tell it to use US-ASCII and then specify all of my text with that character set, then re-enter in character sets for all of my fonts. Then when I export that document to a PDF file, it gives each of the fonts a character set, and the entire document can be left with the correct character set to save space. Note also that it doesn't have to be the default document character set when you print it: you can print from another application.
